One owner? Motorists buy ex-rental cars from garages

Thousands of motorists have been cheated into buying ex-rental cars from official car dealers – who tell them the cars have only had ‘one owner’.

The Office of Fair Trading has started an investigation into the £35 billion second-hand car market after nearly 70,000 consumers protested last year.

Buyers 1)..... that they had paid too much after being told their cars had only had ‘one owner’ when, in fact, they had been rented out to many drivers. 2)..... rental firms use a ‘front company’ and change company names to register cars, which means that buyers can’t see that the ex-owner is a rental firm when they inspect the car’s documents. A spokesman for the car rental firm Enterprise, which uses a company called ‘ERAC’, said: “We use ERAC to 3)..... administration. We buy so many cars every year that we find it easier to use ERAC. We don’t do this to cheat.”

Minister of Transport Norman Baker told the Daily Telegraph newspaper: “This is a trick to get higher prices for cars that have been driven by many people with no interest in the car. Many cars have probably been driven very 4)..... Every ex-rental car should be clearly listed as such.”

British car club the “Automobile Association” said that previous ownership should be clear to buyers. Spokesman Edmund King said: “Anyone who buys a used car wants to know the history of the car and there’s a difference between a car from one owner and a car from one car rental owner that could have had 50,000 users. 5)..... 50,000 users may have driven the car in very different ways. However, buying rental cars isn’t always a bad deal – they get good servicing and regular checks. In this case, the consumer must know who the previous owner was. Some clear information on ownership would help the consumer to make a decision.” He also said that some dealers cheat their customers by reducing the number of kilometres: “We believe that this cheating costs consumers £100m a year.”
